

Obsession or Stubbornness?

From one pothole to a reporting platform for every Canadian city. And why the caring mattered far more than the code.

Eight months. One pothole.

Then a 12-minute form, five pages, a reference number, and a status page that never changed. That is where most people quit. The cost of caring got higher than the value of caring.

Cupholders.

Volkswagen's engineers refused them for years. The car was a temple, not a coffee table. A hundred rational decisions, one human blind spot.

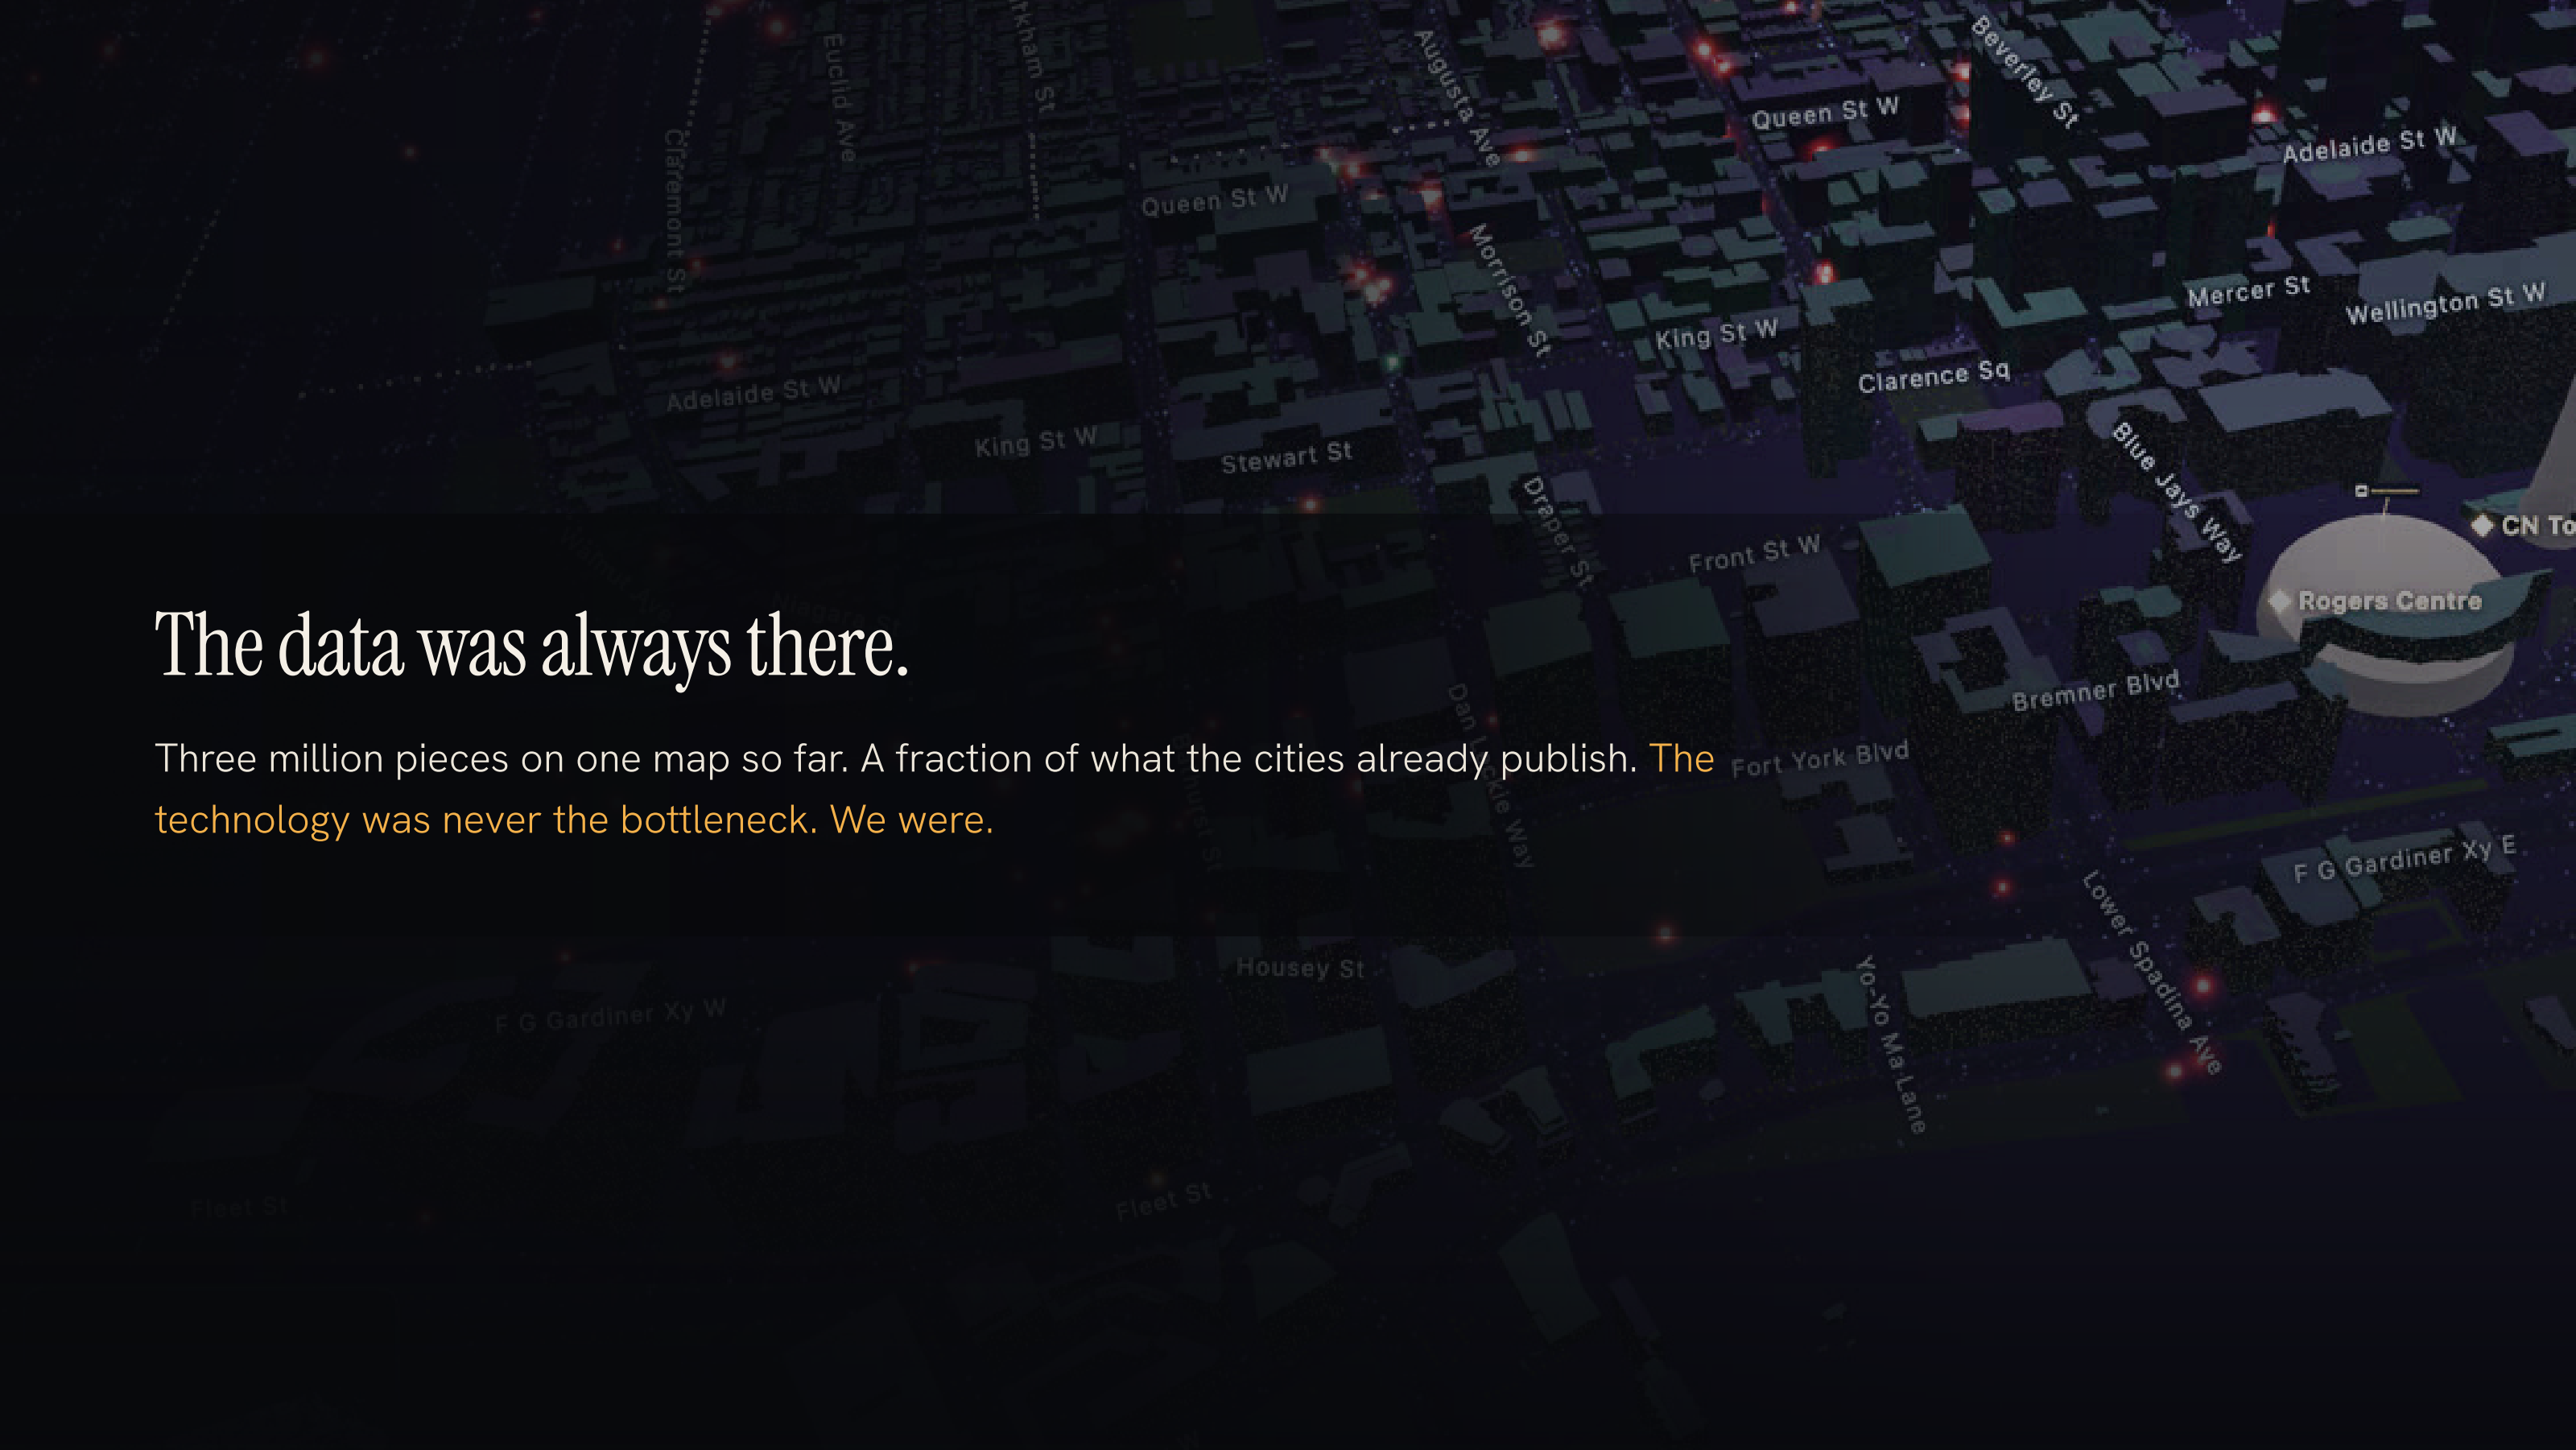

This is not about me.

My only specialty is refusing to walk past a problem. This time a pothole. Next time something else.

And it's not just me. Over a thousand reports across seven cities. People came back.

One photo. Or five words.

Thirty seconds, and it's on its way to the city and your councillor. Make not using it feel stupider than using it.

The data was always there.

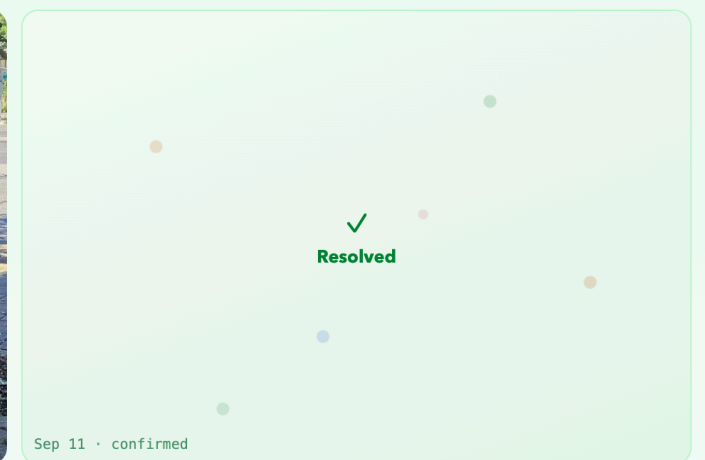

Three million pieces on one map so far. A fraction of what the cities already publish. The technology was never the bottleneck. We were.

Every report gets the city's own reference number, without you chasing it. When the city marks it fixed, the answer comes back to you, on the record. This one took four days. That's the loop, closed.

Now look around the room you're in.

You are sitting inside Algoma University, in downtown Brampton. A campus is a small town that someone runs. So is a hospital, a mall, a main street. If you can draw it on a map, it can be live in a week.

The seventh city was a Tuesday afternoon.

Seven cities, one map. Brampton is not on it yet. Closing the loop takes one person inside the city saying yes.

It was never the technology.

cares a whole awful lot,
nothing is going to get better.
It’s not.”*

We are here.
We are here!”*

Obsession or Stubbornness?

Both.

I'm not asking permission. I'm building it now. The only question is who moves with me.

Thank you.
